CV (Curriculum Vitae) Generator

• Beneficiary

Some people find it challenging to create a CV, not because they have nothing to show to their employers, but because people frequently have the wrong mindset. You limit your opportunities for success if you understate the contributions you can provide, which in turn prevents the possibility of creating an elaborate resume. One must ensure that their CV stands out among the competition because it is an essential piece of material in getting the best chance of getting hired during the process. And so, the main beneficiaries of our program are certainly the new graduates and job seekers looking for better career prospects. This initiative not only lessens some of the obstacles they face but can also encourage them to fill the spaces between their work history and achievements.

• Deployment

Visual Studio Code will be used to program this software. Once completed, the program may be published as a stand-alone offline application or made publicly available online. Until everything is decided, the deployment will still be determined. Even after deployment, we would not be able to affirm that the program would run as smoothly as we expect since there is always the possibility for bugs to occur. Frequent updates and bug fixes will be expected as we move towards the expected final product.

• Case Discussion

A CV outlines the details of one's academic attainment, employment history, professional certifications, skills, and accomplishments gained. It should also state your career objectives (depending on the position you are seeking) and the contributions you can offer, with certainty, if you are employed. In essence, impress your employers that you are the right fit for their team.

Some common issues people have with a CV are the following:

• Not knowing its structure:

Although it is not a fascinating aspect of a CV, understanding its structure is crucial since you should make it concise and informative. By keeping it short and simple, you get to focus on your strong points without any room to spot any possible shortcomings.

• Writing too much about oneself or what you do:

Sometimes people write too much about themselves, especially the pressure that lets them feel like they accomplished something. People are easily bored if you include way too much unnecessary information that they must be attentive of. Limit what you include in your resume to those that are most interesting and relevant to your employers.

• Not stressing achievements:

Employers always investigate credibility. The best CV will inevitably be filled with accomplishments; that much is a given. The issue is that some people are hesitant to include certain accomplishments because they believe they are not noteworthy enough. Any achievement that you can relate to the work you are applying for can be used to highlight your strengths.

In fact, many people, especially recent graduates, struggle to organize their CV's, which makes them look unappealing to employers. Creating a CV is a challenge for many individuals, particularly young people. The program that we are about to create should assist those who struggle with creating a thorough and instructive resume for potential employers by giving them a template that can easily be followed. This tool should create an overview of their attributes and traits with a polished appearance that increases the users' employment prospects.

Finally, this CV generator should be anticipated because the program will be created to be simple to use, alter, and arrange with the information you have previously placed on its panels. The application also provides a template that you may customize depending on your preference. The most important thing is that your CV accurately reflects your essential qualifications and achievements to convince employers that you are the best candidate for the position. A strong CV is a big part in helping you land your chosen career!

Group Members:

- King Aj Magalona
- Alfred Andrion
- Prince Oncada